NIFTY GETS THE PRIZE

NIFTY WILSON and his pal, Rocky, left the school auditorium yacking constantly in a flagrant violation of the Hillstown High assembly rules. They were cautioned by one monitor and two teachers before they reached their lockers but by then they had just about completed their discussion. "It's a wow of an idea, Rocky," said Nifty with enthusiasm. "This'll give us a chance to see what kind of civil engineers we'll make." Rocky agreed, "Yeah, we'll start work today. But it'll mean action, man, if we're gonna try for the first prize. I'll meet you after school at your house."

The whole school was buzzing with the plan as presented by Mr. Hart, the principal. The students were to work singly or in cooperation with another who shared their aims career-wise, in demonstrating their interest in the job or profession they wished to undertake upon completion of their educations. A twenty dollar prize would go to the winner in the boys' division and a like award to the girls' division winner.

Nifty mumbled to himself, visions of roads, reservoirs and dams filling his head as he jogged out to his jalopy after school. He was startled out of his reverie by the bell-like tones of his almost steady girlfriend, Joyce. "Nifty! Hi, wait for me." He turned to greet the pretty blonde as she caught up with him. "Isn't it just too thrilling about the career contest?" she queried. And before he could reply, she hurriedly continued. "Marge and I want to open a beauty salon after graduation so we're going to give each other permanents and get all slicked up and then at the judging we'll be living testimonials to our own qualifications." "A mouthful if I ever heard one, sugar," replied Nifty loftily. "It just so happens that you are now talking to the winner of the boys' division . . . that is one-half the winner. Rocky and I are gonna construct a model of civil engineering that'll ring bells in the Department of the Interior." Joyce was hardly listening. "Of course we'll have to demonstrate mud packs and the like and it'll all take practice. Nifty, can you rush me right home. Marge is going to be there soon and we want to get started practicing." Nifty opened the car door for her. "Sure thing, doll. It'll be a speedy delivery, too, 'cause Rocky will be waiting to get launched on our production."

The three-day period passed quickly as the students hustled themselves on the career contest. Nifty and Rocky were the first to stop work for a fling at a chocolate float the afternoon before the final judging. And soon they were joined by other members of the gang. In his usual fashion, Nifty was bragging loudly. "You guys ain't glimpsed a thing until you see our creation. It's nothing less than terrific," he said modestly. Rock left the counter to answer the jangling phone. "Let's not tell the whole world, Nifty, huh? When we win that prize we want to surprise a few people."

Nifty was still chattering when Rocky beckoned him to the phone. "It's Joyce," he said quietly, "And brace yourself, pal, she's in a tizzy." Nifty took the receiver and tried to talk. "Don't say a word, Nifty Wilson," said Joyce frantically, "I'm desperate, do you hear me? Simply desperate. I need your help immediately." "Sure, Joyce," replied Nifty, "Whatsa matter?" Joyce explained that Marge had the mumps and so couldn't help demonstrate their beauty parlor techniques. "Now that's where you come in, Nifty darrrrling," she purred persuasively. The gang watched as Nifty's face got red, he sputtered and protested, "Oh, no, Joyce . . . never THAT!" He was obviously listening to a tirade and getting embarrassed at the interest displayed by the guys. Finally he said, "Lissen, baby, I'll be right over. I can explain better when I see you." He hung up and made a sheepish exit.

Twenty minutes later, Rocky took another phone call. "It's me, Nifty," said the voice. "Listen, Rocky, you'll have to be on hand alone for the judging. I'm sort of . . . er, tied up. Don't forget to let 'em know we're partners. I wanna be sure and get my share of the prize money." "But, Nifty . . ." began Rocky, "I got a hunch what Joyce talked you into. Don't do it, guy . . ." Nifty interrupted him, "Nobody'll recognize me, Rocky . . . an' for the luv o' Pete, don't give me away, will ya, pal?" And he hung up.

Later that afternoon the students applauded when Rocky and his absent partner was named first prize winners for their civil engineering display. The students roared with laughter when Joyce Kramer appeared on the stage leading a figure in a huge white cosmetic robe, wearing a hardened mud pack and a head full of permanent wave curlers. She gave a short talk, showing her own permanent wave and manicure and then a brief resume of the treatment being undergone by her "partner." They were named prize winners in the girls' division. Everything went well until Joyce's partner tried to creep off stage and was led back reluctantly by Mr. Hart the Principal. In the midst of the tugging, Mr. Hart tripped over the cosmetic robe and fell flat, with the partner landing on top of him. The mud pack cracked open resoundingly, several curlers popped loose and a bewildered Nifty Wilson was revealed to his roaring classmates. The house came down!

The newspaper carried the story with pictures yet . . . "VERSATILE STUDENT WINS IN BOTH DIVISIONS. Combination beautician's model and civil engineer, Nifty Wilson, panicked the assembly this afternoon . . . ! The versatile student cannot be reached for comment at this time."
